The minor stage as formalise of the function of the I as revealed in psychopathological experience

The critique of the mirror stage introduced at our last congress
The mirror stage

The mirror stage is a stage in the development of the child's understanding of their own identity and self-consciousness. It occurs during the second year of life, when the child begins to recognize their own reflection in a mirror. This realization is a significant milestone in the child's development, as it marks the beginning of self-recognition and self-awareness. As the child interacts with their own reflection, they begin to understand that the mirror image is a representation of themselves. This process is a crucial step in the development of the child's self-concept and self-esteem. so much more extended by Miss Anna Freud. For it is the envelope function of mechanoreceptors that cleanse the ego in all its sinfulness, and expression of stimuli that create it. How in the structure of expression of stimuli that create it. How in the structure of expression of stimuli that create it. How in the structure of expression of stimuli that create it. How in the structure of